was wanted to follow up a clue. And he determined to devote himself to whatever Catton might require of him, if only to prove Gorby to be wrong. So pleased was he at the mere possibility of triumphing over his rival that, on casimily meeting him, he stopped and invited him to drink.

The primary effect of his sudden and thought, deaming himself quite a match for Klisip, both mentality and physically, Gorby socspted the invitation.

"Ah!" said Klisip, in his soft, low voice, rubbing his lean white hands together, as they sat over their drinks, "you are a lucky man to have laid your hands on that hansom can murderer so guickly."

"Yes; I flatter myself I did manage it pretty well," said Gorby, lighting his pips. "I had no idea that it would be so simple—though, mind you, it required a let of thought before I got a proper start."

"I suppose you're pretty sure he's the missing will prove an alibit? said Calton. "Well, sir," answered Klisip not the outre. "Well, he's not going to put in guch a ferne I can see he can make."

East Melodurie before 2—no, he wasn't at Toorak."

"When was the letter delivered?"

"Shortly before 12 o'clock at the Melbourne Club by a girl who from what the waiter saw of her appears to be a disreputable individual. You will see it says bearer will wait him at Bourke street, and as another street is montioned, and as another street is montioned, and as Fitzgerald, after leaving Whyte, went down Russell street to keep his appointment, the most logical conclusion is that the bearer of the letter waited for him at the corner of Bourke and Russell streets. Now." went on the lawyer, "I want to find out who the girl that brought the letter is."

"But how?"

"Heaven bless my soul, Kilsip, how stupid you are!" cried Calton, his irritation getting the better of him. "Can't you understand—that paper came from one of the back slums, therefore it must have been stolen."

A sudden light flashed into Kilsip's eyes.

"Talbot Villa, Toorak!" he gried. Last week The World printed (19,163 Want ads.; an average of 2,737 announcements each day; an increase of 2,526 ads. over corresponding week last

A sudden light hashed into Klisip's eyes.

"Talbot Villa, Toorak!" he cried, quickly snatching up the letter again and examining it with great attention, "where that burglary took place."

"Exactly," said Calton, smilling complinently. "Now do you understand what I want-you must take me to the crib in the back slums where the articles stolen from the house in Toorak.
